These two issues of Theory into Practice, a practical newsletter of the North American Montessori Teachers Association (NAMTA), contains feature articles, upcoming events, and a job bulletin detailing employment opportunities categorized by state and country. The March issue focuses on television's effects and contains an article on the 1st Annual National TV-Turnoff Week, along with "Plays End" (Joseph Chilton Pearce), describing detrimental effects of television on child development. The May issue contains two articles: (1) "The Freedom of Responsibility" (Christopher Ackerman), which discusses the importance of developing responsibility in children; and (2) "The Transition from Home to Classroom" (Priscilla Winning), which focuses on children returning to school after summer break, including reactions of regression, fear, fatigue, and irritability, and giving tips to help ease the transition into the new classroom environment. (BGC)
During the last week in April 1995, thousands of schools, libraries, and community organizations will join together in a coordinated effort to encourage millions of families and individuals to turn off their TV sets for seven days. In exchange, participants in the first annual National TV-Turnoff Week will engage in a broad range of substitute activities that foster greater social, physical, academic, and creative development.

The average American watches more than 4 hours of TV each day. At this rate, by age 65, that person will have spent 9 years watching television. Upon graduation from high school, the average American child will have spent more time watching TV than in school.

Successful regional turnoffs in the past have proven that a solid one-week recess from TV helps establish conditions that allow for more family interaction, reading, volunteering, exercising, enjoyment of nature, playing of sports, taking part in community affairs, thinking, creating, and doing.

To learn how to organize a local turnoff in your school, contact: Elizabeth Barrett at TV-Free America, 1322 18th Street, N.W., Suite 300, Washington DC, 20036. Tel (202) 887-0436 or Fax (202) 887-0438. TVFA will help get you started and, for a $5 donation, send you an “Organizer’s Kit” that includes a guidebook, poster, bumper stickers, pledge cards, and an information packet.

Play’s End

by Joseph Chilton Pearce

 Pearce eloquently and dramatically describes the detrimental effects of television on children’s development and hence on future generations. Use this piece in your school’s parent education program to promote National TV Turnoff Week.

Play develops intelligence; integrates our triune nature; prepares us for higher education, creative thought, and taking part in and upholding a social structure; and helps us prepare for becoming an effective parent when that time comes. Play is the very force of society and civilization, and a breakdown in ability to play will reflect in a breakdown of society. We are a tough, resilient species; our capacity to compensate for damage is enormous. Our children could compensate for hospital childbirth and the ensuing separation anxiety of day care and its abandonment, but children can’t compensate beyond a point, and we went beyond that point years ago. Some ten years after we began to systematically separate infants from mothers in hospitals, eliminating bonding and breaking down development of the limbic-heart dynamic, we introduced television. The major damage of television has little to do with content: its damage is neurological, and it has, indeed, damaged us, perhaps beyond repair (Buzzell, n.d.; Healy, 1980; Mander, 1977).

First, television replaced storytelling in most homes, and it changed the radio from a storyteller to a music box. When television is criticized, its apologists point to similar warnings made when radio burst on the scene early in this century, but radio as an endless storyteller sparked the imagination of and helped give rise to a generation whose creativity changed the face of the earth (for better or worse). Television, on the other hand, has now been with us far longer than radio was before television’s introduction, and its programming has deteriorated at an astonishing rate for the same reasons that it damages us.

The major damage of television has little to do with content: its damage is neurological, and it has, indeed, damaged us, perhaps beyond repair.

Television also replaced family conversation in general. The television tray replaced the dinner table and its captivating table talk. Carol Gilligan (cited in Prose, 1990) points out that grandmothers used to sit and relate their childhood stories to a rapt audience of grandchildren. That remarkable series of books by Laura Ingalls Wilder grew out of her parents and grandparents “telling their stories.” Gilligan saw this as a primary need that grandmothers had (a recapitulation that rounded out their lives), but grandmother tales filled many needs: They provided a continuity between generations, gave children a sense of history, and established a continuum of meaning to life. I heard both my grandmother’s and grandfather’s stories either directly or indirectly through my parents. And I knew my mother’s childhood as I did my father’s by their reminiscing, which would hold us spellbound on a winter’s evening or at the table. I clearly saw my father’s boyhood on the river at Milan, Tennessee, so clearly that to this day those images, formed as he told his tales, shine so vividly in my mind I mistake them for my own childhood. I see him as a little boy skipping school to play with his handmade boats, harbor, and wharf; when he forgot them one evening and the river’s rise carried them all away, the loss felt like my own. My mother’s childhood played out in such clear images that the last two decades of the nineteenth century were as real to me as my own day. Both my paternal and maternal grandmothers’ far less gentle stories of escaping the Yankee armies in the Civil War made that conflict intensely real, my very own struggle. In passing their stories on they gave us tradition, continuity, place, and meaning. We knew who we were and where we came from, our lives had significance.
drama, meaning “Tell me about when you were a little boy” my daughter begs, and never tires of listening (even to my repetitions and elaborations).

Second, with television on the scene, parents rarely played with children. All sat around the box, and even playing among siblings disappeared. Thus no capacity for play and its internal imaging developed. Nintendo does not and cannot replace imaginative play.

What’s Wrong with Watching TV?

1. Television takes time away from other more wholesome activities. (The actual time kids spend watching television is time not spent playing, reading, talking, etc.).

2. Television competes (and generally wins) against alternative family activities. (Children will often reject activities such as listening to a story or playing a game in favor of the passive pleasure of TV-watching).

3. Television interferes with the social development of children. (Watching TV does not require any sort of interaction with others).

4. Television takes the place of play. (Just when children are ready to acquire and develop important playing skills, parents begin to use TV as a babysitter).

5. Television renders children less resourceful. (Because TV is so easily available to children, it tends to serve as a universal “filler,” inhibiting the development of creative skills for which quiet of “down” time is a prerequisite).

6. Television has a negative impact on children’s physical fitness. (Many scientific studies have found direct relationships between incidence of obesity among children and time spent watching TV).

7. Television has a negative effect on school achievement. (Kids who watch excessive amounts of TV have less time to read and to do homework. They stay up later and go to school tired. Statistics show that heavy TV watchers score lower on most achievement tests).

8. Television watching may be serious addiction. (Compulsive viewers turn to TV for solace when they feel distressed, and though they derive a temporary emotional relief while watching, they end up feeling worse afterwards).

Third, and perhaps most critical, television floods the infant-child brain with images at the very time his or her brain is supposed to learn to make images from within. Storytelling feeds into the infant-child a stimulus that brings about a response of image-making that involves every aspect of our triune system. Television feeds both stimulus and response into that infant-child brain, as a single paired-effect, and therein lies the danger. Television floods the brain with a counterfeit of the response the brain is supposed to learn to make to the stimuli of words or music. As a result, much structural coupling between mind and environment is eliminated; few metaphoric images develop; few higher cortical areas of the brain are called into play; few, if any, symbolic structures develop. \(E=MC^2\) will be just marks on paper, for there will be no metaphoric ability to transfer those symbols to the neocortex for conceptualization, and subsequently, no development of its main purpose: symbolic conceptual systems.

Failing to develop imagery means having no imagination. This is far more serious than not being able to daydream. It means children who can’t "see" what the mathematical symbol or the semantic words mean; nor the chemical formulas; nor the concept of civilization as we know it. They can’t comprehend the subtleties of our Constitution or Bill of Rights and are seriously (and rightly) bored by abstractions of this sort. They can sense only what is immediately bombarding their physical system and are restless and ill-at-ease without such bombardment. Being sensory deprived they initiate stimulus through constant movement or intensely verbal interaction with each other, which is often mistaken for precocity but is actually a verbal hyperactivity filling the gaps of the habituated bombardments.

On average, children in the United States see six thousand hours of television by their fifth year, at which point, in the midst of what should be the high point of their dreamlike world of play, we put them in school, prevent bodily movement (most purposive learning is sensory-motor at this age), and demand they handle highly abstract-symbolic systems al-
Television floods the infant-child brain with images at the very time his or her brain is supposed to learn to make images from within.

I never heard the word bored until I was in the armed service in World War II. I never knew a bored child in my own childhood. There was far too much to do, yet we had only a few toys.

When today's toddler sees her mother making cookies and wants to take part, she need not resort to jar top, stick, and mud, like some primitive. She probably has a complete miniature kitchen, scale-model perfect with battery-operated appliances. When a five-year-old sees the road-roller, he doesn't need to find an old spool: The massive toy industry provides a complete road-roller, exact in detail, battery-powered so that the child can watch passively as he does when the same item is advertised on television. Children are inundated with objects that don't stand for something but already are. A clothes-pin need not be draped with an old rag to make a doll; our daughters have shelves bulging with dolls of every description—lifelike, sexy, indeed complete with all the organs for real precocious sophistication if you like. Where is the metaphoric-symbolic learning or the dream-world of play-acting the adult?

Forty years ago, along with the epidemic of day care and television, a new phenomenon burst on the American scene: the toy store. Until that time, the average American child had a maximum of some five toys. I can recall each of mine; they were precious. Christmas, the only time we ever got a toy, was a time of near unbearable excitement. My Flexible Flyer sled was secondhand, but lasted my whole childhood. My Radio Flyer wagon was new when I got it and lasted from my fifth year until my twelfth year as a major item. My Rollfast skates were new and lasted until my fourteenth year. I used them hard. (A new pair cost 79 cents, no small sum.) I bought, for $2.87, my bicycle at age eleven, an ancient relic for which I saved for two years, and it lasted till I left home at fourteen.

The electronic toy that does everything at the push of the button itself habituates. Boredom sets in immediately; what's next? Even playing with such objects children often merely act out the images advertised on television. When they identify with the television children playing with the same toy they feel some group authenticity, a belonging not found elsewhere. Television, of course, is the way to sell those toys that then represent the television images flooding the young brain, reinforcing the television stimulus when that stimulus is absent.

The 30 percent or so of our children still capable of learning in school have been read to and played with by their parents, generally in addition to television and mountains of plastic junk. This shows how little attention is needed to nourish the brain and get its creativity going. While the screen itself prevents neural development its content affects behavior. By 1963...
Violence on television produces violent behavior in young people. Everyone knows that. Once one has habituated to violence as a way of life, however, anything less is boring. There are sixteen acts of violence per hour of children’s programming, only eight per hour on adults. By the time our children become teenagers, they have seen an estimated 18,000 violent murders on television, their primary criteria for what is “real.” Life is shown to be expendable and cheap, yet we condemn them for acting violently.

There are many other facets to the current collapse of childhood. I have touched on the issue only briefly, but one thing is clear, schools have deteriorated because they must deal with damaged goods. And as our damaged children grow up and become the parents and teachers, damage will be the norm, the way of life. We will habituate to damage. Nothing else will be known. How can you miss something you can’t even recognize, something you never had?

References

*A major television filmmaker asked me to consult on a series for children, supposedly designed to stimulate development of imagination. The film company had already signed with sponsoring toy companies who stipulated the “usual sixteen acts of violence per hour” (otherwise, the rationale goes, children lose interest). The filmmaker’s concern was how to incorporate that much violence into the programming without having it affect the child. I quietly bowed out.

An essential aspect of our work as Montessorians is to promote the development of responsibility in children. How we do this is an ongoing challenge, one that has not gotten easier over time in an American culture that often fails to encourage such growth in individuals.

Family life today is more harried, fast-paced, separate, and disjointed than lifestyles of the past. As a result of this instability, we see more children lacking consistent parental guidance and attention. We see more children raised by the electronic media childcare system. We see children without the prerequisite kinds of experience and exploratory learning necessary to healthy, confident, well-rounded development.

In short, in greater and greater numbers of children, we see a lingering state of immaturity and lack of ability to assume responsibility. Often this is accompanied by a crippling perfectionism, an overblown fear of failure, and an assumed inadequacy that keeps young children from trying. These are some effects that our society has had upon children, as I have observed in nearly twenty-five years as an educator.

There are few concepts more misunderstood and abused by the "Me Generation" of parents than the issue of freedom. In the name of freedom, many parents have copped out on their own responsibility to instill in their children fundamental values like discipline and responsibility. It's hard work being there consistently with children, guiding, correcting, setting limits, and following through. It requires more than a token effort or an occasional attempt.

As the adult, our job is to have faith in what we do, as well as in the inner resources of the child. We have to believe that every child needs and wants to attain responsibility and self-discipline, simply because there can be no true and lasting happiness in life without it. We must believe that we are not over-burdening small children when we lead them in this direction. We must know that in our work as Montessorians we offer a great service to another human being. We try to guide her or him to what is the truth.

It amazes me how often I hear young children speak to their parents with utterly inappropriate rudeness, and the parent either ignores or sheepishly tolerates the incident. Ignoring disrespectful behavior does not prepare the child for successful relationships anywhere. Freedom of self-expression is important; equally so are limits based upon mutual respect. A byproduct of our lifestyles is a cloud of guilt too often hovering over relationships with our children. Working, separated, or divorced parents are particularly prone to this type of stress. Also, many parents are truly ambivalent about how to go about imposing limits when their goal is to experience "quality time" with their children.

Children who are given the majority of power in the family are not happy campers. Their behavior cries out for someone else to take control and relieve them of the burden of being in charge. As Montessorians, this is often the greatest service we can render the child in our classrooms.

It is how we go about this work of helping the child learn to assume responsibility, that is our most important task. We often have to alter behavior patterns adopted at home. Also, a child may be tremendously ambivalent about following our direction toward growth in a more normalized direction. Children may actively resist what is good for them.

As parents, we too can more easily let things slide, ignore inappropriate behavior, and hand over an inordinate degree of power to the child. But it is the adult who must take charge in the Montessori classroom. We must continually expand our degree of sensitivity to the child, be always encouraging, and be firm when necessary. Of utmost importance, we must tailor our expectations realistically to fit each particular child in each particular set of circumstances.

Observing in a Children's House classroom recently, I witnessed a scene that wonderfully illustrates some of these principles. At the end of their lesson together, the directress asked a young boy, Jack, to roll up his rug.

Jack refused, whining that he couldn't do it. This directress, knowing otherwise, in an encouraging tone, reminded Jack that he'd done it before. He became tearfully obstinate and continued to say "No." The teacher gently explained why it was necessary and offered to help Jack get started. (This process started to consume a lot of time and energy and there were numerous other children the directress hoped to get to in the not-too-distant future. Still, she never lost patience throughout.)

With help, Jack began to roll up the rug in a half-hearted manner. Continuing on his own, this project fell apart half-way; the rug collapsed into a twisted blob. Jack escalated his protestations that he couldn't do it. The directress remained calm, gave him some pointers, and told him to try again. After an inner struggle during which it seemed as if he concluded that she really meant business, Jack decided to make another attempt at rug-rolling. With the directress right there, offering advice and continued encouragement, at last the rug was rolled. She praised his efforts.

Then the directress asked Jack to carry it over to the rug rack. More resistance and protestations. The teacher respectfully insisted.

Finally, Jack shouldered the rug and, with tiny steps, made his way across the room to the rack where rugs resided in vertical formation. Jack maneuvered his load toward the waiting slot, but couldn't quite connect the end of the rug with the opening in the rack. He appeared near tears again, but his teacher, from her position nearby, offered encouragement to keep trying. A heartfelt effort from Jack and the rug slid safely home.

As if he'd just grown two sizes, Jack turned and sauntered back across the classroom. A smile of confident satisfaction transformed his features. The directress sincerely praised him once again for a job well done.

A while later, Jack was at a table creating a picture. Finished, he got up to return a basket of colored markers and spilled them out across the floor. "This!" I thought, "should be interesting." Without a word, Jack picked up each one, then returned the basket to the shelf. He went off calmly in search of other work. He was smiling.

This directress rendered a great service to this child. It would have been far easier, and easily justifiable, had she simply "helped" Jack roll up and return the rug. Although he was evidently removed from it, this directress had faith in the power within the child to assume responsibility for himself. He was clearly ambivalent throughout the entire process. But the clarity of the teacher's belief allowed her to remain confident in the role she had chosen in this interaction, which some might deem a power struggle. Her faith in the child became a catalyst in the transformation of the consciousness of the child. At the end, Jack walked away empowered by a healthier degree of self-confidence. This is how the adult in Montessori gives fundamental aid to life.

This type of encounter is what we should see in a Montessori classroom. Chances are good that it would not have happened in most other settings. It was a case of helping the child to help himself. It embodied the principles of consistency, gentle firmness, and encouragement to assist the child in opening up to his own inner resources, his own power for devel-

At what age do we begin? According to Dr. Montessori, by 2½ to 3 years of age, just about every child is not only capable, but desirous of being responsible.

An untrained eye, perhaps a parent or nursery-school teacher, might have witnessed this scene and judged the directress as too strict or overbearing about such a minor issue as rolling up a rug. The observer might feel that such a young child needed more direct help, that little Jack was almost being persecuted by this powerful adult; he should have been free to leave the rug as it was instead of the big deal made over it.

The directress could have "babied" the child, taken the popular view that little children don't really need to be so responsible. They have plenty of time for that later in life; for now we should let them enjoy the freedoms of childhood as long as possible. Simply let them have fun doing as they please! This view sounds tempting. In practice, though, it generally leads to unhappy children—the kind who used to be referred to as "spoiled brats." When we treat children this way, we allow them to build and strengthen behavioral patterns and attitudes that can only make their lives more difficult the older they become. The adage about old dogs and new tricks is applicable here. Look how hard it is for many of us so-called grown-ups to change our less responsible behaviors. Being taught responsibility in no way lessens the child's experience of joy. In fact, it increases it!

Isn't this so much of what our work as Montessorians is about? And since all children are not the same, we go about this work one individual at a time, altering our approach as well as our expectations, as we strive to meet the particular needs of each child. We don't expect all children to be capable of the same things at the same time.

But all children are capable of growing in independence, responsibility, and self-discipline. In combination with an increasing ability to concentrate, these are the ingredients in the alchemical process that results in real freedom and happiness. We assist every one, at her own unique pace, along this path. How we do this effectively is part of the ongoing learning process of the dedicated Montessorian.

At what age do we begin? According to Dr. Montessori, by 2½ to 3 years of age, just about every child is not only capable, but desirous of being responsible. Obviously, this is within certain parameters, which expand as the child develops. We don't expect four-year-olds to cross a busy street on their own, for example. But by age seven, the average child is capable.

In many ways it's a lot easier to practice these ideals consistently in the Montessori classroom than in the home. Parents are often faced with more truly compromising situations than are teachers in the prepared world of the classroom. Teachers can assist parents by learning how to communicate these principles, suspending some of our own judgments, and realizing the tremendous differences that come into play when our relationship to a child is one of parent, rather than teacher.

Effective support of these ideas can be difficult to come by today. Montessori educators can also help parents recognize the child's need for certain kinds of experience as well as guidance and limits. We can offer them Montessori views regarding particular situations and circumstances. Above all, we can assist parents in understanding that one of the greatest services we can render our children is to help them to become responsible human beings.

Just consider all the new aspects to which the child needs to adapt: a new physical environment, new adults, a new peer group, separation from parents, and a brand new routine—all occurring simultaneously!

The beginning of the school year is a very exciting time in the Children's House classrooms. It is so wonderful to welcome the returning students and observe all the amazing changes that have occurred over the course of the summer. The students always seem to return with great enthusiasm and eagerness. They are delighted to become reacquainted with their classmates and show renewed interest in the classroom materials and exercises.

It is very interesting to observe the new students entering a Montessori classroom for the very first time. They enter the new environment full of curiosity and wonder. They are drawn to all the fascinating objects on the shelves, and they are sometimes overwhelmed by all of the new faces. Often new students will enter their new classroom very cautiously. The younger children in particular are sometimes a bit apprehensive when first transitioning from home into the classroom. What may seem to the adult as a simple procedure can be a very major step in a young child's life. Just consider all the new aspects to which the child needs to adapt: a new physical environment, new adults, a new peer group, separation from parents, and a brand new routine—all occurring simultaneously!

Montessori guides are very familiar with the behavior that sometimes accompanies the child's adjustment to all these transitions and changes: regression, fear, fatigue, irritability. I would like to share some ideas and suggestions that may help to ease each child's transition into the new classroom environment. Many of these ideas apply to younger children, but many could apply to any child, regardless of age.

Point out simple procedures during this first visit that may otherwise be overwhelming on the first day of school: how to hang up a jacket, where lunchboxes are kept, where the restroom is located, etc.

Encourage parents to help prepare their child for the new routine by speaking positively and confidently about the new setting ahead of time. Children are like a barometer of their parents' feelings. They will sense their parents' confidence and therefore will tend to feel the same way.

Establishing a consistent morning routine is crucial in helping the child to feel secure in the new surroundings. Regular routine and rituals help to strengthen confidence and give children a sense of stability in their world.

Adequate amounts of sleep and rest play a key role in getting the morning off in a positive manner. This simple point is very often neglected. An appropriate bedtime must be established in order for the child to feel well rested enough in the morning to truly become self-paced. Giving the child this freedom will hopefully avoid the pressure and stress of hurrying and rushing to school each day. Young children are especially sensitive to the benefits of arriving to their class on time, feeling fresh and calm.

Encourage parents to convey information regarding changes in routine. Children need to be informed of changes that may occur on a particular day. Even a very young child can gauge his or her day by certain daily activities that take place. For example, inform children if they will need after-school care on a given day, and reassure them with some particulars: "Mom will pick you up at 4:00. That's just after snack time."

Families can prepare in the evening for the following day. In doing so, children can become involved in the planning and decision-making. Allowing children the freedom to make choices regarding their clothing, breakfast and lunch preparation, and other such matters (within limits), helps to build independence and instills a sense of responsibility.

- A short and cheerful departure made by the parent at the classroom door assists the child to enter the classroom confidently and comfortably. Lengthy farewells only add confusion and stress to a child's transition. It is important to reassure new parents that they are welcome to schedule a time to visit the class, or to join the class for lunch one day. Remember, new parents are often experiencing some difficulty adjusting to the milestone of their child being in school.
