This paper focuses on the writing process and young children, suggesting prewriting activities and discussing writing, revising, and publishing in the classroom. The paper also enumerates what children like, such as interesting topics, self-selection, listening to stories, reading their writing to peers or younger children, and special formats for final copy. The paper provides two lesson plans: Using KWL for Writing a Report, and Using Oral Telling of Stories to Prepare for Writing a Story. Each lesson plan states lesson goal; cites materials needed; suggests a step-by-step procedure for classroom implementation; notes time required for completion; and discusses evaluation. (NKA)

LESSON PLANS

Using KWL for Writing a Report

This lesson was used for 2nd graders in January. It could be used well with older students. Children receive specific guidance throughout the writing process. They need to be able to work independently, asking for help as needed. Each child has a different topic. Children should have read and/or listened to information articles and should know how these are different from narrative text before writing a report such as this.

Lesson Goal to organize and learn information about a topic and write and revise a report

Materials one easy reading information book about animals for each child, drawing and writing paper for preparing the report, construction and drawing paper for displaying the report

Procedures

1. Show children a list of animals for which you have enough books for one per child. Each child selects or is assigned an animal.

2. Children write the name of their animal at the top of a sheet of drawing paper and divide the paper into 3 columns.

3. Children write 3 things they KNOW about the animal.

4. Children write 3 questions (things they WANT TO LEARN) about the animal.
5. Children read their book and list 3 or more things they learn about their animal, answering their questions if possible.

6. Children review the KWL information and then write a report about their animal. Children should be told about how long to make their reports.

7. Children receive help from the teacher in revising. They should read the report to at least one peer and receive suggestions, compliments, and questions.

8. Children recopy and illustrate the report.

9. Children display reports on the bulletin board.

Time required for this lesson varies with the independence of students. For 2nd graders it can easily take one day for Prewriting and KWL (1, 2, 3, 4), one day for reading the book and completing the KWL chart (5), one day for writing the report (6), one day for revising (7), and one day for preparing the final copy for display (8, 9). Typically, 2nd graders find it difficult to focus on a writing task for more than 30 minutes but can sustain interest over several days. They enjoy hearing about each other’s writing in process.

Evaluation Self-evaluation, teacher comments, use of a writing rubric are preferable to letter grades for young writers. Rubrics should be simple and include only a small number of things to be evaluated if they are shown to children.
Using Oral Telling of Stories to Prepare for Writing a Story

This lesson was used for 2nd graders in January. It could be used well with older and many younger students. Children receive specific guidance throughout the writing process. They may be able to work independently, asking for help as needed. Each child selects characters and ideas for a story. Children should have read and/or listened to narrative stories and discussed the components of a story.

Lesson Goal to create and tell a story, then select ideas for your own story and write and revise it.

Materials drawing and writing paper for preparing the report, construction and drawing paper for displaying the report.

Procedures

1. Begin with discussion of a favorite story. Who are the characters? What is the setting? What problems do the characters have? How do they solve these?

2. Children tell a group story. Each child contributes one or two sentences, and the story is complete when all have had a turn. The teacher provides commentary as the story unfolds, eg, "Now we have a main character. Where did the story take place?" "Ah, a problem. I wonder how they’ll solve that." "We must be near the end of the story now. Do we need anything special for the ending?"

3. At the end of the group story children discuss the characters, setting, problem, solution, sequence of events, or other story components. Keep this discussion simple if children have little practice with writing stories.
4. Each child has a turn to name a character and a setting for the story he/she will write. The teacher makes a few suggestions or encouraging comments about each, especially emphasizing how eager we all are to read the story after it is written.

5. Children write their stories, asking for help as needed.

6. Children receive help from the teacher in revising. They should read the report to at least one peer and receive suggestions, compliments, and questions.

7. Children recopy and illustrate the story.

8. Children share stories first with each other and then with kindergartners.
Time required for this lesson varies with the independence of students. For 2nd graders it can easily take one day for telling the oral story (1, 2, 3), one day for selecting and discussing characters and settings for stories (4), one day for writing the story (5), one day for revising (6), and one day for preparing the final copy for display (7), and one day for sharing (8). Typically, 2nd graders find it difficult to focus on a writing task for more than 30 minutes but can sustain interest over several days. They enjoy hearing about each other’s writing in process. For this story activity a strong motivator was the promise of sharing the finished stories with kindergartners.

Evaluation Self-evaluation, teacher comments, use of a writing rubric are preferable to letter grades for young writers. Rubrics should be simple and include only a small number of things to be evaluated if they are shown to children.
