Early Childhood:
Targeted Investments
Letter from the President & CEO, Kelly Causey

Before joining the Colorado Children's Campaign in October, I had a pretty good sense of the organization’s 32-year legacy, impact and influence. Yet I continued to be impressed and amazed after every event, meeting, presentation, report release, advocacy training, community visit and more. The caliber of this organization is truly exceptional. More importantly, it is all in service of Colorado children. Each among our staff, board, networks and friends are driven to remove barriers to health, education and happiness for Colorado children facing the most obstacles.

With your support, in 2016 the Children’s Campaign moved significant policy forward on behalf of kids. Our researchers tackled some of the trickiest and most complicated issues facing children. Our outreach team trained and coordinated advocates across the state. Our networks branched out to Coloradans in all corners to hear issues facing communities.

Weeks after I joined the team, we hosted our 2016 Annual Luncheon featuring author and advocate Wes Moore. He told us that Colorado’s progress in improving the lives of children is important, but that completion of our goals is imperative. Involving communities most impacted by policy decisions in the work is crucial.

“We will never have an honest conversation about the future of our communities if only a sliver of the population is part of the conversation,” he said. “We fight for the others. We fight to make sure that they are in the room, too.”

I’m excited to share a few examples of our work in 2016 to follow that advice. From coordinating new coalitions focused on equity to listening to Coloradans share the history of racism in their communities, we are focused on including the voices of those most impacted in policymaking.
Early Childhood: Our work in 2016 focused on making child care and early education more accessible and of higher quality. Teen parents and domestic abuse survivors have better access to child care subsidies so they can work. More counties can participate in a pilot project to reduce the “cliff effect” of working parents losing support with even a minor increase in income. Families experience fewer disruptions in child care support due to minor fluctuations in income during the year. The number of early childhood mental health specialists has been doubled. And the state now invests more in a number of effective early childhood programs, from nurse mentoring to quality child care settings.

Health: In health care access we championed investments in Colorado’s effective family planning program and fought a rate cut to Medicaid primary care providers. We supported a study of premium rates for individual health insurance based on geography.

K12: Removing barriers for kids facing the most obstacles to success was a major focus of our K-12 work in 2016. We worked with advocates from communities of color to respond to the state’s plan to implement the new federal Every Student Succeeds Act. We continued to defend progress made in education policy in recent years by protecting educator accountability systems, high standards and aligned assessments.
